Let me state right off the bat that St. Frances de Sales is my guy. After having read an article about him in "The Word Among Us" magazine that told how his patience and perseverance in Geneva brought thousands of Calvinists back to the Church, I was so impressed that I chose him as my Confirmation saint when I entered the Church almost two years ago. His "An Introduction to the Devout Life" I would give ten stars if I could - I consider it the silver-bullet book on how to live devotionally without actually being cloistered. But after reading this through twice, I was still left wondering: okay, so how DO I "find God's will for me?" The book is very much a continuous and lingering meditation on a single theme, and in that sense can be taken as quite aesthetically pleasing. But the one theme seems to be, not "finding God's will," but "living in complete passivity." The word St. Francis uses is here translated as "complacency," which is I suppose to be taken in a not-negative sense of "peacefulness." But overall what seemed to be going on as an unspoken assumption is that "whatever happens" is God's will, so the key to being in conformity with it is just complete submission to everything that happens. With the book understood as pointing just to that assumption, I found it quite unsatisfying - in fact, isn't the assumption that "every event that happens is specifically God's will" part and parcel of the Calvinism that the "gentleman saint" fought against? Then immediately after finishing the book for the second time, I chanced to pick Thomas Merton's No Man Is an Island (which I haven't read yet) off the shelf.
